Boneyard doesn't have many series characters, and there's a reason for that. In other universes the series is nothing more than a spandex soap opera. No one is willing to take chances.
Marvel, DC, Valiant, Defiant, even Dark Horse- they're all too chickenshit to actually do anything with a character.
There is no growth, no danger, no life.
Not so here.
Garry is only sixteen. Does that surprise you?
Maybe you saw him bungling his point when he was the only guy sitting in the audience of The Sally Jesse Raphael Show that didn't want me strung up by my testicles.
A lot of my thugs have asked what the hell this scrawny punk was doing for Boneyard. What did he have under the hood that warranted him the chance to run with the wolves, the sickest, baddest, meanest fucks in comics.
Garry's hungry.
He's ready to take chances. When I tell him to go out and devour the latest Vachss novel or Ellroy's latest he does it, no question's asked. When you tell'im to change a script because it read's like a bad episode of NYPD Blue he soaks up your advice like a sponge.
You watch out for Garry.
We're beatin' the little fucker into our kind of thug and when we're done with him...
the boy's gonna run.
